

LET'S TALK BUSINESS 1

Good morning present entrepreneurs and entrepreneurs from the future (hopefully, this would still be around to guide a boy born today on the 06/29/2020. ambitious, yeah?). I honestly don't know where to start from as I was never really good at teaching, reading books and understanding fully? Yeah, I'm great at that. But sharing that knowledge out, not really as efficient. So, I'm going to try and break it down to the simplest way I could and hope my messages hit home perfectly.

First off, let's establish a fact before we proceed. YOUR IDEAS ARE WORTH NOTHING, a good execution is better, but positioning yourself in front of your ideal customers – that's GOLD!

Let's begin – first I apologize to you reading this that is so much in love with the idea they have thought about and guide it with their lives, saying if I tell anyone about this, they would steal the idea. bruhh even Zuckerberg shared his Facebook ideas with people, so – perish that idea, stop having a close door fling with your idea and get to work. So, how exactly do you do that? Get to work?

You have to identify a problem. Instead of just coming up with an idea, identify a problem people go through that's worth solving and build an idea around that problem. People only pay when you're taking away some form of stress from them. Making their lives better and they'd pay what you ask of (wonder, why religious leaders get lot of gifts? That's the reason). Before you start out on your entrepreneur journey, having clarity to these two questions is very important. What problem am I trying to solve? Who has these problems? Answering these questions allows you to understand your customers and their needs. You need to be thinking a lot about your customers and the problems they have. To achieve this, you really need to be in front of these customers talking about your ideas and how it could solve their problems (remember when I said "get to work" in paragraph 3. This is the first step). As entrepreneurs we almost always fall into the trap of starting a business based on the assumption we have for our customers. Wouldn't a better way be actually talking to these customers to know what they go through? It's true sometimes customers don't know they have a problem (think of the phone, we were just fine writing letters, right? Wrong). Talking to your customers actually saves you the stress of building a solution nobody wants. Think of a crying baby, of course the baby can't eloquently describe what he/she is going through, you still know he has a problem and your best shot at solving that problem is being closer, probably picking up the baby and studying his actions to know what's wrong. Okay, a business example. I see a lot of girls on WhatsApp story selling clothing items and although I commend their "hustle" I honestly just give them 4 months to fold up and it almost always happens. Why? Same reason. They are providing a solution without first identifying the problems of their audience. A better way will be chatting up your audience, introducing them to your brand and intentionally asking them this "if they were to buy clothes, what kind would you likely buy?" also ask after the first question has been answered "what you like about this cloth or what motivates you to want to buy that?" 9 out of 10 would give you valid answers and you can source your inventory using that knowledge. Without ignoring the fact that by asking these simple questions you put yourself in their mind whenever they need clothes (among the numerous vendors you are competing with).

Asking about the problems your customers face helps you understand what is involved in moving into the next step - Building the solution. We'd be discussing that and more in the next episode of Lets talk business. Have a lovely, today!

- Written by Gabriel
Lead writer @ Exquisite Business Management